The ten or fifteen years, scientific article on "Lake Basins" is valuable as well as readable. "The English Bible," setting forth the literary beauty and value of the common translation, is written with decided ability. "The Fall of Clarendon," the "Writings made an unfair and partial statement of of Bolingbroke," "Lord Palmerston," that occurrence, we feel called upon to

The second part of Charles Reade's serial novel of "Griffith Gaunt," keeps the reader in that state of perpetual expectancy and surprise, which Reade's method of developing character through the quick presentation of a throng of tantahzing incidents, is so well designed to produce. The first number of "Passages from Hawthorn's Note Book" conducts us into the very literary worship of that into the very literary worship of that bensive and constitutional threshing. eminent romancer, and shows us out of On this occasion, as at the close of what scattered meditations and observations this consummate artist wrought his elaborate works. There are many sentences in the collection, giving the ideas of stories, which might furnish the capital for a writer of magazine tales, though the ideas, as carried out, would lack the master's subtlety and grace of treatment. One passage in the Note Book sheds light on Hawthorn's own method as a novelist, and enables us to understand why he did not take the days, when the house was so crowded with business that it could not take him in hand, for the exercise of his peculiar tactics.

We trust, for the honor and dignity of the State, that this is his last appearance at the capital in any public capacity. We hope that the Demograts of Floyd county, if they have no better material than the Hon. Cyrus L. Dunning, will manage to get along without a rep.

Book sheds light on Hawthorn's own method as a novalist, and enables us to understand why he did not take the romancer's privilege of subordinating his characters to his own will and pleasure. "A person," he says, "to be writing a tale, and to find that it shapes ittell against his intentions; that the characters act otherwise than he thongki; that unforseen events occur; and a catastrophe comes which he strives in vain to havert. It might shadow forth his own fate—he having made himself one of the personages."

Both bypant and Longfellow have posms in the present number. We wish, in view of this conjunction, that Longfellow had a more adequate specimes of his power than "The Bells of Lynn," as, in spite of the solemnity, sonorousness and swing of the verse, and the perfection with which it embodies a mood, the nige does not exhibit him at his best; thill that of Bryant, "Castles in the present number to the condition of the perfection with which it embodies a mood, the nige," is one of the most exquisite things be ever wrote, fine equally in melody and matter, thoroughly instinct with the most besutiful qualities of his genins,
